Celebrating SSP’s 40th year
1975-2015

Eric Clem, originally from Escondido, California, was an early staffer in the history of SSP. He worked for several summers and was a Site Director at the lone site in 1978. In 1979, in his early 20s, he was killed in a Jeep accident. Following his death, a scholarship fund was set up by family and friends in his honor. This fund formed the initial basis of SSP’s Endowment Fund. The Endowment currently has a balance of $67,625.

This year, Sierra Service Project marks its 40th anniversary. This is a good opportunity to reflect on the values that continue to inspire all of us — all of you — who make up the SSP community.

Here are some of the values and beliefs I think make this community and organization fun, exciting, and life-changing:

Worth
We believe that young people really matter and are worthy of the time, energy, and love of adults.

Faith
We have a conviction that young people build strong and authentic Christian faith through acts of service.

Trust
We trust in one another. For example, we trust that teenagers can safely use power tools and that young adults can lead with wisdom and grace.

Transformation
We know that change is possible. We believe that low-income communities are strengthened and families are helped when young people repair homes and do other types of service with joy and enthusiasm. We know that transformation, in small and large ways, happens during every interaction in the SSP experience.

Community
We believe in community, in people coming together to learn from and help one another.

I thank you for being part of our community; for giving your time, your energy, your financial donations and your prayers to this community.

The Sierra Service Project community has existed for 40 years because of people like you and thousands of other supporters. May God bless and keep you!

“I thank you for being part of our community; for giving your time, your energy, your financial donations and your prayers to this community.”
These last few months after a summer in Tsaile, I find it difficult to adequately relate the experience, and never know how to begin.

To do it justice — with the desert’s unique green and stark red-rock beauty, the depth of Navajo gazes, the simultaneous playfulness and pressing pain that many youth carry — feels impossible. I do not know how to speak the exhaustion of toting concrete, or the joys of leading large group discussions with gusto, nor how to touch on the threads of spirit holding us at the canyon’s edge, the closeness we felt in uncertainty of the future, amidst the certainty of our Creator.

This summer, as we explored what it means to “speak up,” we tried to parse out words of life from words of despair and hopelessness that seem to bombard us constantly. We focused on hearing and discerning God’s will, on truly absorbing words of abundant life, and on the ways we are called to make them echo. With all of our ramp-building and fence-erecting and onion-chopping and story-telling and guitar-singing, I did not want our community to end.

“We focused on hearing and discerning God’s will, on truly absorbing words of abundant life, and on the ways we are called to make them echo.”

I know I am continually asking for God to guide me and use me, constantly asking to hear His voice of love and assurance and direction — maybe that makes me needy, or maybe faithful, if I can actually remain still enough to hear Him and trust He will give me the words, the voice, and the resources to speak up and out. At the same time I am coming to realize the words are not mine, those I write or speak, and it is God who provides the words we need. As we continue this autumn, growing, serving, preparing for next year as well, my prayer for us all is that we are able to be quiet enough to listen to all the ways God is speaking to us and through us of His love.

This summer I took a group of combined middle and high school youth to SSP for the first time. We went to Walker River, and none of us knew what to expect. The thing that struck me most is the way the youth bonded so instantly. The 40 of us there that week were from 11 different churches, and no one knew each other very well, but soon I could not tell who had come from where.

As my work group gathered that first night there was some awkwardness, but it was not long before we were sharing from our hearts. Each youth spoke of something in their life that had been, or was, hard to overcome. Some heartbreak or struggle that was trying to shape them one way, even as they were fighting to turn things around and make a new, Godly way that broke old family patterns.

“I don’t know what happened but my son has returned a different child. He felt fully accepted for who he is.”

It was humbling to be a part of this group of six strangers who were willing to go to such depths to make a difference for their future, even as they were making a physical difference for another stranger as we worked on her house. The mom of a boy from my youth group had this to say:

“I don’t know what happened but my son has returned a different child. He felt fully accepted for who he is, not judged for those places he doesn’t feel he fits, and as though he can make a difference in the world.”
The “Tolowa Coast,” named to honor indigenous Tolowa Dee-ni’ Indians, is 11,000 public acres of open and forested dunes and extensive lagoons, ponds and wetlands. Tolowa Dunes State Park and the Lake Earl Wildlife Area hold natural and cultural resources of great significance, and offer exceptional biodiversity and refuge for wildlife.

One of the biggest threats to the biodiversity of this area is invasive European beachgrass, which creates a sterile desert of spiky grass. It destroys the homes of wild creatures and nothing will eat it — it must be removed!

This summer, two different groups of SSP volunteers helped battle this threat, clearing half an acre of new habitat for native, endangered dune wildlife! SSP accomplished an incredible amount of work, donating 658 hours to this ongoing restoration project and breaking the record for most number of people on a single outing — 73!

“SSP volunteers helped battle this threat, clearing half an acre of new habitat for native, endangered dune wildlife!”

Participants learned about endangered species and Tolowa culture, and got to enjoy lunch on beach. The trips were guided by Tolowa Dunes Stewards, a program of Smith River Alliance. To date, SSP volunteers were some of the happiest volunteers Tolowa Stewards has encountered — enthusiastic about the work, with many teams delightfully singing their way through the day!

When the chance came to attend Sierra Service Project as an individual youth, I jumped on the opportunity. My congregation does not have many youth, and I had not had a service experience in a few years. I had no idea what to expect. My family has been involved with SSP for many years – my aunt was one of the first site directors (Janet McKeithen) – so many of the stories I had heard were of the old days. When I arrived in Chiloquin, the other youth were more familiar with each other, being from a few congregations, but thanks to the efforts of veteran youth, counselors and staff, I did not feel at all like an outsider. Work on the project was brilliant. My group worked fast, and had a great deal of fun.

“SSP has all the elements that many people do not get in their common life, and it is an opportunity unlike any other.”

Our cooks were fantastic, and having fresh, tasty food all week was well worth the hard work. Food preparation was one of the key social times. If a youth didn’t have something to do they could always lend a hand in the kitchen, which thanks to the cooks, was never a quiet place. Nor was the chapel a quiet place in the evenings. We had three keyboardists and a couple of ukulele players. We had a Native American speaker on Thursday, and the groups assigned to each evenings’ study were always seeking some new and unusual take on the day’s topic. Nothing was boring.

As a whole, SSP was one of the best things I did all summer. The camp seems almost insane as a concept: as my father (Martin Gollery) once said bluntly, “SSP is a program where you go out into the middle of nowhere for a week, sleep on the floor, and do hard labor all day. And you pay for it.” But despite its counter-intuitive prospects, the Project works, and works well. SSP has all the elements that many people do not get in their common life, and it is an opportunity unlike any other. I cannot honestly say that I know anybody who would not enjoy a week as a youth.

Working with the Sierra Service Project was an enriching and awe-inspiring experience. I often tell people that the greatest investment in our economic future is to allow the younger generation to be civilly involved. Not just involved in only one part of society either.

“Peeling back the layers of perception, socioeconomic status, stereotypes, and faith.”

In the words of the wise “Shrek,” society is like an onion; it has layers. Often times we have to pull back several of those layers before we get to the root of the problem.

The Sierra Service Project did exactly that. Peeling back the layers of perception, socioeconomic status, stereotypes, and faith. The sheer connectivity of the systematic approach taken by the team that I was blessed to work with, week in and week out, was simply magical.

Through the tears, chants, hugs, gloves, trash bags, and long lines of mini-vans, I have come to cherish the values and principles that SSP continues to instill in its beloved family. If I had to do it all over again... I wouldn’t change a thing.
When I reflect on Sierra Service Project, there is one word that I always think of: community. Time and time again, I experience loving, accepting communities at SSP. These spectacular communities of strangers are built in just one week. Out of the many camps that I have participated in, I cannot find one that builds such a close-knit, diverse, inclusive group of people in such a short amount of time, and that is part of what makes SSP special.

“I time and time again, I experience loving, accepting communities at SSP.”

I have met teenagers from other denominations and from different states. I’ve worked alongside people two years younger than me and others forty years older. There are many layers to SSP communities, be it the staff and their quirks, the church you’re traveling with and your history, your work group, or the stories that are shared when everyone returns from a worksite. I knew after my very first day that the SSP community was one I wanted to return to summer after summer.
I was first introduced to Sierra Service Project last year by our United Methodist campus ministry, Central Washington University Wesley, and going on an Alternative Break seemed preferable to going home to sit around my parents’ house for a week. This year it was just a given that I was going.

Personally, I am a journalist and a photographer because I want to help people share their stories in the most authentic way I can and to educate others on the topics raised by those individual testimonies. Besides the spiritual renewal SSP trips provide, I feel like it also allows me some practice in this concept of, for lack of a better label, “philanthropic photojournalism.”

People should know about places like Dignity Village in Portland, Oregon. They are a community of people who most would write off for what they don’t have instead of realizing what they do have. Their living conditions may not be the social norm, but together, and with some help from organizations in the area, they’ve created homes for themselves.

Stories like these, showcases of determination and good will, are the reason I love being involved with SSP and also how SSP has consistently renewed not only my faith, but my love for what I am doing.
My first Weekend of Service in Sacramento was also my first time being a staff member for SSP. During that weekend, I was given the opportunity to work alongside middle school youth at a local elementary school’s garden. I was so impressed with how diligently the youth worked. It was surely an inspiring sight to see. Although the weekend felt like such a short amount of time, there was never a shortage of positive energy, hard work, and fun. Just as with any SSP summer week, there was a common sense of togetherness, community, and love in doing service work throughout my time at the Weekend of Service.

Nicaragua

Laughing children and sweating adults, mud and rain, concrete and rebar, a visit to a beautiful lake and a steaming volcano – these things are all part of the SSP experience in Nicaragua!

This year two teams consisting of thirty-six individuals worked alongside local community members to build a classroom addition at Villa Japon Learning Center, a small rural school. The Nicaragua program is a life-changing experience of service and cultural immersion.
2014 SSP Statistics

SSP volunteers completed 138 projects for:

- 65 Families
- 35 Community Organizations

- 48 Painting Projects
- 17 Sets of Stairs
- 7 Wheelchair Ramps

Building materials cost $62,946, including:

- 29 tons of concrete
- 215 gallons of paint

Food to fuel our volunteers cost $60,832, including:

- 14,000 eggs
- 1,500 loaves of bread

125 churches from 6 denominations sent teams to SSP:

- Hennepin Avenue United Methodist Church in Minneapolis, MN
- Emmanuel Episcopal Church in San Angelo, TX
- Kailua United Methodist Church in Kailua, HI
Last summer SSP hired 42 young adult staff members. In 2014, 205 summer staff alumni were surveyed. The results show the long-term impact that working for SSP had in their lives. We are honored to have had these dedicated leaders work for Sierra Service Project. They have continued to serve others in their careers and free-time.

SSP Impact on Summer Staff 2014 Survey Results

4 out of every 10 staffers worked for three or more years on staff.

Over 85% reported that their SSP staff experience helped them to develop leadership, teamwork, and problem solving skills.

Over 60% are currently involved in a church community.

15% have attended seminary.

60% have worked for another non-profit, and 55% have worked for faith-based organizations.

1 in 3 has lived and/or worked in a low income community in the U.S.

1 in 5 has lived and/or worked in a low income community abroad.

70% volunteer on a regular basis.

60% donate money on a regular basis.

over 1/3 volunteer on a regular basis for an organization dedicated to youth development or social justice.
Donations make up 24% of Sierra Service Project’s budget. Without these donations, we would have to raise the fees that youth pay to participate by at least $100.

In 2014, 360 donors gave $266,467 in financial contributions, in-kind donations, and donated facility use!

Over 80 volunteers gave their time by towing trailers, finishing summer projects, helping us remodel and move into our new office, sorting T-shirts, loading vehicles full of bulk food and building materials, and assembling mailings throughout the year.

We love our volunteers!
